The portrait itself, which was painted by Carle J. Blenner, a noted artist of New Haven, Conn., and New York city, created a very favorable impression among those present and many complimentary remarks were eard regarding the painting and its fetalled likeness to Dean Perkins.

Following the acceptance of the portrait by Mr. Stewart, Dean Perkins himself was called to the platform, and was greeted by a rising burst of applause which lasted several minutes. Bowing in acknowledgment of the tribute. Dean Perkins spoke feelingly of his long association with the University and pledged himself to still greater efforts for its Perkins was presented with a large bouhe occasion by the College Street Church and which rested on his table during the sectations which it had been his pleasure with Dean Perkins as a pupil under his instruction during college. "He put God right into the world for me," said Mr. Kingsley.

Dean Perkins as "Little Perk," a term mittee, submitted and read by W. B. which the boys affectionately called the Gates, chairman. These reports are professor, and which the instructor never seemed to resent. "The boys loved that kind of a chap then, as they have all through the years," said the speaker. indulging in retrospection, Mr. Kingsley spoke of the days of Buckham, Good-Torrey and Perkins. 'I think we may challenge any college group of men who have served throughso long a time," he said.

Briefly, he told of the efforts which had been made to select the very best portrait painter who could be found to paint the picture of Dean Perkins, and the painting was then unveiled.

'We are not honoring to-day so much the man who has been great in the world of letters," said Mr. Kingsley in closing, We are honoring 'Little Perk,' instructor and friend, the man we love and honorsimple, useful, great man."

kind, always helpful.
"In behalf of the University, I gratefully accept this portrait of this wonderful teacher, this kindly Christian gentleman, this long-time friend." DEAN PERKINS' RESPONSE

Dean Perkins, when called to the platform, responded fittingly to the many compliments which had been paid him.

"I never felt as I have been feeling today except once before," said Dean Per-"On the morning of my wedding day, I felt that I was having committed my care a treasure which I must keep and love and cherish. To-day I have been feeling that same way. I must live higher life, a truer life, a more useful life This day will sink its memory into my heart. In retrospect, he said:

the latter part of the war. Three lines of activity have been carried out in this connection: (1) To secure news regarding the military service of all men from the university means of blanks sent to the men to be filled out and returned to the committee. (2) to supply the men in the service with news of home and home affairs through personal letters and bi-weekly letters from the university; (3) war records of all the Vermont men who have been in the service put into permanent form, the first draft of which is the war service list issued by the committee this spring, which will form the basis of a more complete list to be issued later. Professor Bassett urged that the Alumni sociation stand behind the military committee in this work, and to make a new appropriation to carry on the work of getting together the material for a permanent record.
